Efficient. Prepared. Mobile.

Mobile devices and cloud technology are increasingly being used to complete both personal and work-related tasks.

People are now conditioned to getting the information they need in the moment they need it.

While B2B customers are researching products online and interacting in new digital ways, the sales representative is still needed to facilitate the buying process in positive ways.

According to research conducted by SiriusDecisions* (a leading global B2B research and advisory firm), buyers are engaging with sellers from the very beginning through the end of their buying journey.

Technology therefore needs to assist with the sales cycle, not replace it.

“Not only do buyers interact with a sales representative in all phases of their decision-making process, but they overwhelmingly describe those interactions as positive in over 85 percent of the buying experiences studied.”

The winners will use mobile technology to empower their salespeople by making sales and marketing materials easily accessible and always available.

For salespeople to be successful, a mobile sales tool needs to:
